"She is an animal. Servile as a dog. And yet if he is careful to make no demands, to leave the air between them open, another version of the windup girl emerges. As precious and rare as a living bo tree. Her soul, emerging from within the strangling strands of her engineered DNA." ? Paolo Bacigalupi, The Windup Girl

"The Windup Girl" made quite a splash when it came out. It won the Nebula and the Hugo and it was the author's debut novel (although he'd written four previous novels that he couldn't get published). I bought a copy when it came out in paperback but I struggled so much with all the strange Thai names and words in the first chapter that I put it ...

The Windup Girl herself is so self pitying and debased by the brutality the author inflicts upon her, I recoiled and she is given little to do other than suffer. There is no let up from the grimness which the author dwells on endlessly and repetitively. Nobody is happy and there is no leavening humour, friendship, or even a likeable hero to ...
